

Photosynthesis is the process where a plant converts carbon dioxide and water, in the presence of light and chlorophyll, into glucose and oxygen.

Glucose is used by the plant as food. Left over glucose is stored as starch for later use.